Court Data Promised Unit on Delinquency

Newell W. Ellison, chairman of the Council on Law Enforcement's juvenile delinquency committee, said yesterday Juvenile Court Judge Edith H. Cockrill will give his group "all the information we need"—and indicated such information would include representative case histories.

"Judge Cockrill was quite in accord with our plans," Ellison said. "She said she would be glad to help us whenever we begin our study."

The study, Ellison said, will include a "fair sampling" of representative case histories, tracing juvenile offenders from the time they were apprehended until their return to the community.

Ellison's statement came after a meeting Friday with Judge Cockrill in her chambers.

Judge Cockrill said yesterday the meeting was "very satisfactory" and dealt only with "general questions." She said she felt any statement should come from the chairman of the committee.

"Mr. Ellison's statement is accurate and adequately covers the situation," she added.

Last week Judge Cockrill turned down a Welfare Department request for the names of all juvenile delinquents. Welfare Director Gerard M. Shea had planned to use the names in establishing a central registry on children in trouble.

The judge's position has been that the law gives her the discretion to release individual cases to improve "the welfare and treatment of the individual child," or representative cases not identifying juvenile offenders. But the statute, she feels, does not permit the court to make available a "total list of all children who come before it."

Members of the juvenile delinquency committee will meet this week to start their study, Ellison said yesterday.

"We still have to educate ourselves," he said. "We haven't yet set down actual procedures and practices to follow in our study."

In addition to Ellison, two other members of the five-man committee attended the meeting with Judge Cockrill. They were George C. Clarke, president of the Washington Criminal Justice Association, and Leroy H. McKinney, representing the Washington Bar Association.

Other committee members are United States Attorney Leo A. Rover and Donald Clemmer, head of the District Department of Corrections.

The committee is scheduled to come up with a preliminary report and recommendations for changes in juvenile enforcement procedures by November 17.

Proposed New Motel at Jones Point Bridge Site

The proposed $300,000 motel at S. Washington and Church sts., Alexandria, a site that would be used for a cloverleaf interchange connecting the proposed Jones Point bridge with Mount Vernon Memorial blvd. It was at first thought the two-story, 92-unit structure would jeopardize plans for the bridge but Rep. Joel T. Broyhill (R-Va.), said a slight change in construction would leave the motel under a viaduct.

Delinquency Rise Seen By Bureau

One out of every 50 juveniles between the ages of 10 to 17 were referred to courts throughout the nation in 1952, Dr. Martha M. Eliot, chief of the Children's Bureau, reported yesterday.

She based her estimate of 385,000 delinquents on figures submitted by 342 courts reporting to the bureau.

In 1952, these courts saw 10 percent more delinquent children than in 1951 and 29 percent more than in 1948.

"This disturbing situation calls for some deep thinking on the part of citizens in big and small communities across the land," Dr. Eliot said.

"Agencies which are trying to stem this rising tide need help and public understanding if the services they provide are to be expanded to meet expanding need.

"Shortages in child welfare workers and in probation officers, overworked juvenile courts, understaffed juvenile police units, overcrowded training schools for delinquent children, or training schools that don't have the staff to do a good job with the children who have been committed to them, are conditions which won't be improved by chance."

Dr. Eliot noted that the Senate subcommittee investigating juvenile delinquency "soon will be pointing up the types of problems which communities face when boys and girls have trouble in finding a constructive and satisfying life."

"Public and voluntary agencies which are trying to cope with this problem, community by community, need renewed citizen interest and citizen participation in finding out what can be done to help keep our nation's children out of trouble, and on their way toward useful lives," she said.

Courts reporting to the bureau did not include any from the District, Maryland or Virginia.
